Excerpt from History of the University of Virginia, 1819-1919, Vol. 4: The Lengthened Shadow of One Man When we come to inquire into the character of the professional schools of the University of Virginia during the Seventh Period, 1865-1895, we find that they were subject to precisely the same influences as those which were, at that time, impressing themselves so deeply upon the like schools in every important seat of learning in the United States. As to the professional courses in all the principal institutions, it may be said, in a general way, that there was now a broader and more liberal interpretation of what constituted the right preparation for their study. This was to be perceived (1) in the growing attention given to the scientific aspects of their subjects as distinguished from the aspects which were purely technical; (2) in the more rigid requirements, both as to scope and quality, applied to the academic work preliminary to these courses. Let us first consider the history of the School of Law at the University of Virginia during the reconstructive period. When the lectures in this school were resumed in September, 1865, the method and the course of instruction did not differ at all from those which Professor Minor had always followed, and which he had already made famous throughout the Southern States. He could very correctly say that his school had never suspended. What need, therefore, was there for a reorganization?
